The SAI tool is my favorite. It's little more than a duplicate of the clone tool, but it does exactly what it's supposed to do: clones everything. If it doesn't contain all the settings, it will give you the option to add them anyway. I've never seen a hard drive that runs on brutal power like this.

I can only hope that MacAfee will not be the next victim of the fallout.

Thanks. Sandy Chris, Great review, and it's very helpful for a new user to get a good assortment of tips. I have been using Photoshop for several years, but still have not mastered it. I prefer working with RAW for the reasons you mention (getting the best images possible). I still have a hard time loading negatives to digital files, since I shoot four shots per frame. CS4 32.5 was a major project for me, and I still have some worrying times. I recommend an inexpensive balance of an empty fast disk and a reasonably fast PC to carry you through until you discover your new favorite tool. I think I have several dozen covers in different stages of completion that look like the photos above. Out of the Photoshop toolbox It was very frustrating to load in the raw files. Yes, I had some help with forums, but I had to learn a lot on my own to get my files into Photoshop. I have been using Photoshop for a few years now, but only recently started to seriously look at other photo editors (strawberry field and raw convert in win7). I have used first PS, and then RAW convert for years. For years I wanted to move to PS, but was satisfied by the 5.0 pro version conversion. In recent years, I've been satisfied with raw convert. However the last few months results, and I started to notice a very uneven quality from raw convert. During the last 7 days I installed windows7 and software raid. I also installed raw convert and PS. I saw after the software raid installation that I have in RAW convert 5.0285, and had to revert back to 5.0 for another few days.
