The securing of such elongate members to the floor is necessary in order to prevent damage to such members and/or the floor and surrounding environment. This is particularly the case in industrial settings, although the problem exists in many other environments as well. A large number of devices for securing elongate members to the floor have been developed. Typically, these devices comprise some type of protrusion formed on a broad end of the elongate member and a clamping mechanism for engaging the protrusion and holding it in place on the floor or other surface. These clamps are commonly spring loaded and can be actuated manually or with an actuator, such as an air cylinder. In a common manner, the elongate member is inserted into the clamping mechanism. This arrangement is often referred to as a "dead end" insertion because the elongate member is physically located, at the end which bears the clamping

I don't mean just losing the file, but losing the contents of the file, e.g., contacts and appointments. If I'm not mistaken, an Outlook Express backup is a DBX. Someone please correct me if I'm wrong. By "contacts and appointments" I mean the information stored in that file. Of course, I could perform a full Outlook Express backup, but that would be useless if the contents of the file were lost. (I'm talking about an Outlook Express.bak file. Is there a tool that will restore that file to its original state (sans the.bak file extension), or, at least, the contents of that file, even if it were corrupted.) A: First thing to try is to rename the DBX, MBX, and DBX.BKPT files to something that can be understood by the backup tool. So I would suggest renaming it to something like DBX_backup_2011_01_19_11_00.bak. Then when you restore, it should bring up a dialog or something that has a button to recover the DBX backup file. This is no substitute for a full OS restore, but it may do what you need. In addition, the concepts and practices of mainstream education to which children and parents were exposed not only can be highly traumatic but can also be marginalizing.

This suggests that the education used by the schools may be an important determinant of health in Indigenous communities. The highest rates of physical activity and lower rates of nutrition are found among those who do not have access to or attend schools that are specifically designed to promote a healthy diet and physical activity (i.e. the "active" schools) \[\[B23]-[B25]\]. Use of the primary schools and classrooms is also very high in Indigenous communities \[\[B23]-[B25]\]. As such, the education of the primary school age children in these communities must be an important component of a holistic approach to the health of these children. The findings from this study may help guide health and education programs for the Gualai Indigenous people of the Northern Territory. This population, which consists of Torres Strait Islander peoples as well as Aboriginal and other Indigenous populations, has a higher prevalence of diabetes than the Australian population as a whole \[\[B26]\]. Consequently, this has a major impact on the Indigenous health and economy. In addition, diabetes is
