Creating a Personal Cabinet of Learning "I think learning is governed by curiosity." – Tim Galloway My first clear memory of learning strategy is from primary school, and it came courtesy of Tim Galloway’s book “Mastery”. A memory that has stayed with me over the years as it was one of the first real games-based learning experiences I experienced. I got good grades in the classroom but I found the textbooks very hard going. Galloway’s book was a great example of a strategy that I was able to apply directly to what was written in the book. As I have aged, I have seen this process adopted to different learning levels from preschool to college. Gamification of reading has become commonplace for children, with adult books using reviews and star-ratings, but unbound by any physical packaging. When Tim Galloway talks about being a lifelong learner, and learning governed by curiosity, he refers to an education model that he has advocated for the last 35 years. It is a model that encourages that curiosity and exploration is an essential part of a lifelong learning program. I have taken the Galloway’s idea of a lifelong learning or a Learning Cabinet of Curiosities into my own learning as I stumbled along in various roles. My changes in roles certainly have kept me on my learning toes. One of the greatest aspects of this concept are that all of my students are in development, putting in the hours to constantly learn new things. As a teacher at BCIT, I have had opportunities to lead workshops on developing computer-based portfolios as a teaching tool, helping students to store learning artifacts and share them so they can change their learning stories over time. In addition, I have had the opportunity to plan workshops for students focused

“ You can play the game as you usually do, jumping into a fight and dying right away. But the game also allows you to take time to show off your character’s neatness and tactical prowess, and you need to stop and take a break when you see it. Even if you die in battle, you can take a seat and enjoy the good view. " Guardian, IGN “ Evoking a sense of nostalgia, it will certainly take you back to a time when you could just play a game anytime, anywhere. " TechRaptor, IGN, it has not been terribly effective. The defense has had difficulty stopping the run, the offense has been feeble, and both sides have been careless with ball possession. Both of those issues could be fixed with a better draft and some free-agent additions. Keeping Pro Bowl linemen is always a good thing, but the 49ers might be better off bringing in guys who can fix the issues identified above and re-discover some of the playmaking they had in the early years of the Harbaugh/Reagor regime. Caldwell now must work with limited skills at the quarterback position, and that will be one of the bigger challenges in his first year. The offense is still the biggest concern for him. But it also provides an opportunity for a fresh start, and for him to establish himself as a legitimate franchise quarterback. I’m excited. I’m tired of all the "its hard being a coach" statements that people are tossing around. Yes, it's hard, but it's also a lot of fun. Caldwell has one of the best jobs in the league (the NBC broadcasting job is arguably one of the best in the world). I don't know how many of these sites actually have any football players on staff, but... every time I've heard someone from any of these sports sites say something like "I don't know how long a coach is going to last in this league," I always ask... "what are you doing working there?" Most of the time the answer is "i'm a high school coach and they need a cheap assistant," which is fair enough, I guess. But back to our topic... I don't know... maybe nothing, but this COULD be Harbaugh's Big Year (like if the teams he played for ever won a Superbowl). Like I said, I'm excited. For the first time in a while, it bff6bb2d33

We can eliminate The errors of opinion with reference to what is and what is not necessary for a good life. There is a high degree of competence in our ability to detect the errors of opinion that exist in any system or belief or personal philosophy. Everyone agrees that it is necessary to have a system that is reliable and functional, and we can easily recognize when it fails. This is not the case with regard to the opinions we have about what we believe to be necessary. Yet I am convinced that anyone who is serious about improvement must agree that the most important aspect of doing this is to build a system of procedures and practices that work reliably. And yet, paradoxically, when one carefully examines our beliefs about truth, logic, necessity and the like, it is doubtful whether there is any real scientific basis for our beliefs on these matters. It seems as though what we generally take as necessary is simple habit, simple opinion and even simple ignorance. If, then, we want to do better as we progress toward the goal we have for ourselves, it would be good to bear this fact in mind. As we build a system of procedures and practices that work reliably, we must build into it some test of their reliability. This is the key to eliminating the errors of opinion that exist in any system. The surest way to eliminate the errors of opinion is to establish facts about what is and is not necessary for a good life. That is, we must build a scientific system of procedures and practices by which we will become aware of the errors of opinion that exist in our daily lives. This will require that we recognize that many of our beliefs and values are outdated and no longer required. Our values, however, have become the foundation of our system of procedures and practices. This is the fundamental reason that progress in this area is almost totally blocked. You have to be real careful how you advise people. If you have any advice to give, it is to be very radical and challenging. Not to do anything that is a little bit different from where you have been, and that you are not in fact doing right now, but just to be slightly more radical, and to be just as concerned about the environment. But you have to be cautious. If it is just someone saying, "Hey, you gotta act like that. You have to do this," the others will just say, "That's ridiculous, I'm not doing anything like that." But if you tell them, "There is a law of quantum physics
