Characterization of high molecular mass non-RNA materials in human serum. Human serum contains approximately 175mg of high molecular mass non-RNA materials which can be resolved by gel filtration into two components eluted at approximately 45 and 45 min. The molecular weights of these materials range from approximately 1 to 100 MD and although they overlap with the size of known RNA species and polysaccharides, several independent approaches have established that they differ from all known RNA. Antibody-mediated binding has shown these materials to be polysaccharide-related by reacting with both anti-polysaccharide sera and anti-beta glucuronosyl epitopes. Similarly reactivity with glycoprotein-specific lectins suggests the presence of specific carbohydrate moieties. Further characterization by reaction with various enzyme specific probes has demonstrated that they contain neither peptide nor amino acid sequences. Despite their non-native nature these materials are significantly enriched in the plasma of cancer patients, as have related components expressed by the reticuloendothelial (RES) system, suggesting that analogous materials are bound to RES and associated with the RES biotransformation of biological macromolecules.

SYDNEY — A police officer who was on sick leave the week before the Sydney airport attack helped a suspect who had been under guard. Australian Federal Police Commissioner Tony Negus said Friday that the officer in question was on leave at the time. On Wednesday, police officers raided a Melbourne suburb and arrested the Somali-born Australian, Hassan Khalif Shire Ali, for a 2014 rampage that left several people dead and wounded two dozen others. Shire Ali was on five years' probation but had been granted a one-year suspended sentence for the 2014 incident. On Wednesday, he was on a program that should have allowed him to be released. Police said he was still on programs or supervision but was not on parole, which should have prevented his release. It wasn't immediately clear who authorized Shire Ali's release.
