Treatment of kyphosis in a child with a selective dorsal rhizotomy. The authors report the case of a 9-year-old boy with congenital kyphosis deformity. Radiographs showed severe kyphosis with near-the-floor deformity and skin embarrassment. The patient underwent a selective dorsal rhizotomy to decrease pain and improve function. At the 3-month follow-up, the patient reported that he had not experienced any pain or skin irritation. He was able to ride a bicycle without any pain. In addition, he had improved strength and flexibility. The patient's hospital course was uncomplicated and the neurosurgical intervention was found to be a safe and effective alternative in the treatment of congenital kyphosis. 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an on-vehicle system, and particularly relates to an on-vehicle apparatus for diagnosing a charging condition of a battery mounted on an in-vehicle apparatus, such as a vehicle navigation system. 2. Description of Related Art Generally, in a vehicle or an in-vehicle apparatus, such as a vehicle navigation system or an in-vehicle entertainment system, battery charging is performed based on alternating current supplied from an external apparatus, such as a household power supply or a charger. The external apparatus supplies a predetermined amount of power to the vehicle or the in-vehicle apparatus by generating alternating current with a predetermined frequency, and the vehicle or the in-vehicle apparatus supplies the supplied power to a vehicle-mounted or in-vehicle apparatus. In the vehicle or the in-vehicle apparatus, a battery-charging condition of a battery mounted in the vehicle or the in-vehicle apparatus is not directly detected, and therefore, the battery is judged to be in a good condition and the vehicle or the in-vehicle apparatus is in a good condition based on a voltage of the battery measured at an arbitrary time (such as just after a normal power-supply 595f342e71
