Both result in the same sql, only trim is faster when i want to execute my query. trim(?) returns a varchar(767) and alltrim(?) converts it to VARCHAR(4000) which is faster. SQL query with alltrim() SELECT * FROM `schema.`tablename` WHERE `alltrim(`colA`) ='somevalue' SQL query with trim() SELECT * FROM `schema.`tablename` WHERE `trim(`colA`) ='somevalue' A: As you said, they will be the same, but alltrim is not faster. I would say that trim is a bit safer. As alltrim will remove all the delimiters as well, also after all. A: In 10g, I believe both statements are equivalent. They have identical results and performance. In prior versions of 10g, trim could remove delimiters, alltrim couldn't. I don't know which is faster in earlier versions. That part doesn't matter. At the end of the day, your queries are equivalent and the performance difference is non-existent. Dispersion Forces. The present chapter focuses on the main features of the van der Waals (dispersion) interaction in real space and the potential regions in the corresponding quantum mechanical and classical models. First, the purely classical approach is described and compared with the corresponding exact quantum mechanical results. Second, two types of classical models, the Monte Carlo and the Lennard-Jones approaches, are briefly analyzed by highlighting their numerical convenience and the regions of validity in the parameter space. Third, some current

Cohort study.

Our aim was to evaluate and report the experiences of a regional referral and research centre for critical limb ischaemia (CLI). We retrospectively reviewed patient case-notes from 1 January 2000 to 31 December 2011. We included all patients referred to our centre for CLI with critical limb ischaemia and performed a disease-specific, validated questionnaire on the demographic information, investigations performed and outcomes of treatment. We defined CLI as Rutherford-Becker class 4 or 5, amputation or above knee amputation levels. A total of 425 patients were referred for CLI with 292 being suitable for follow-up. One hundred and seventy-five patients underwent infra-inguinal bypass surgery, and 45 patients were considered unsuitable for surgery. The remaining 182 patients were managed conservatively. At review, a total of 97 patients (51.6%) were considered to have achieved a technically successful revascularisation. The median follow-up period of the entire cohort was 24 months. The median survival was 117 months for the entire cohort. The location of the inflow was above or below the knee in 124 patients (69%). There were no significant demographic differences between patients considered to have and not to have achieved a successful inflow. Patients at high risk of death were those with major comorbidity (PWilly: The Excluded Again Willy: e79caf774b

MB.Regulation of cell proliferation by the retinoblastoma protein. The growth of several types of animal cells in culture is exquisitely sensitive to retinoblastoma (Rb) protein. For example, mouse fibroblasts arrested in the G1 phase by Rb overexpression proliferate very slowly. Thus, it is not clear whether Rb regulates the expression of a specific gene or simply the rate of cell proliferation. To investigate this question, we have deleted the normal Rb gene from mouse cells by homologous recombination and found that these cells exhibit a growth phenotype identical to the ones obtained by high Rb overexpression. These phenotypes, here analyzed in detail, suggest that Rb is the major factor that regulates the rate of cell proliferation in somatic cells. People v Paley People v Paley, 31 NY2d 61 (1972), is a 1972 New York Court of Appeals decision that expanded in People v Baker, 95 NY2d 648, 651 (2000), the category of "New York non-lethal felonies" to include breach of the peace and disorderly conduct. The court held that under New York law, the possible punishment for these crimes was less than five years in prison, and so could not be considered "serious" crimes, thus making the Double Jeopardy Clause inapplicable in such cases. Background Defendants Howard Paley and Louis Baker were charged in New York City with breaking and entering and robbery. Both men went to trial, were convicted, and each received a sentence of one year and five months to three years and one month in prison. Upon the completion of their sentences, both defendants were charged with the new non-lethal crimes of disorderly conduct and breach of the peace. When these charges were tried, Paley and Baker were each acquitted. The Appellate Division upheld the convictions, holding that the sentences imposed could be appealed to the New York Court of Appeals. Arguments The defendants argued that the breach of peace and disorderly conduct charges, as well as the robbery charges against them, were part of the same offense, since all of them involved the defendants' "breach
