Q: Will the old MAC address on my server change when I upgrade to Snow Leopard? I have a Macbook Pro that I've been using, and when I had XP on it, the MAC address was assigned automatically. I recently upgraded to Snow Leopard and it now refuses to boot unless the MAC address is entered. If I use my iPhone to manually enter the MAC address, the computer will then boot. The old MAC address can be found in the Directory Utility and I checked, it does NOT change when I attempt to set a new MAC address. Is there a way to set a new MAC address without having to actually boot? A: The MAC address of the computer (i.e. the static part) doesn't change. The unique hardware address is assigned by the NIC (and will stay the same if the NIC is the same). The issue is that MAC addresses are not unique. Each NIC can have multiple MAC addresses (up to some limit). The 10.5 Leopard (and older) does not know that when you change the MAC address of a device, that the device might be on the same device. The 10.6 Lion knows that, and if the primary NIC on the
