Two studies were conducted to examine the effects of response time-based recovery strategies on the reduction of word-level errors and on the advancement of text-reading skills of low-accuracy readers. In Study 1, low-accuracy reading abilities of English-speaking students in Spanish were examined; the authors predicted that the students would show improved text reading by improving their reading skills. To this end, a second-grade class was taught response time-based recovery-reading strategies for regular and irregular Spanish words and was compared with a Spanish-language reader-training group. The results demonstrated that students in the control group significantly improved their reading skills. In contrast, the reader-training group benefited little from the training. No significant differences were found between the two groups in performance on a test of text comprehension. Study 2 examined the effects of responding to irregular and regular Spanish words within sentences on the advancement of text-reading skills of 8 Spanish-speaking students
