Q: Is this allowed by Windows API I'm looking to write a system of intractable heaps (think like a ski-hill) with simple functions to add, search, remove and remove all items in the heap. I'm new to programming and not familiar with when to use structs, classes, functions, functions returning functions, pointers etc. Is this allowable to have a Windows API style of coding (data type=INT with 0=null, etc.)? I can see this potentially being a security problem because of the lack of functions to set pointers to null. A: It is safe, provided you do not perform pointer arithmetic in the heap. If you provide a nice interface to your heap (for instance, a method that will iterate the heap and check to see that a given pointer is null), then it is also safe. That said, there are still issues, such as how to implement NULL handling (and make sure you don't mistakenly leave it out!), that have to be addressed carefully. Edit: The interface for your heap might look something like: struct Heap { int* ptr; int length; int capacity; Heap(int initialCapacity=16) : length(0), capacity(initialCapacity) { ptr = new int[capacity]; // Check that this is at least 0. assert(ptr!=0); } ~Heap() { delete[] ptr; ptr = 0; } bool insert(int val); bool find(int key); bool remove(int key); }; [The clinical value of diagnosing Alzheimer's disease].
