Such vectors are useful in gene therapy of cells in animals and humans. Gene therapy involves the transfer of a functional gene into a patient to treat or prevent diseases or to modify the function of a patient's cells (Wolff, 1993). Examples include the transfer of genes that produce proteins beneficial to the body, such as, for example, recombinant adenovirus that secrete immune-modulating proteins (Waldman et al., 1995; Waldman et al., 1994), including interleukin-2 (huIL-2) (Nigrovic et al., 1995), interleukin-6 (huIL-6) (Ladner et al., 1996) and interferon-α (huIFN-α) (Waldman et al., 1995), and genes that enhance the production or therapeutic activity of other proteins already present in the body, such as, for example, transfer of genes coding for hormones that regulate growth of cancerous tissue (Waldman et al., 1995; Melnick et al., 1994) or genes that encode proteins for treating disease, such as, for example, transfer of genes coding for proteins of the blood-clotting cascade (Lemjabbar et al., 1991; Emory University) or transfer of genes for cellular receptors (Waldman et al., 1995), such as, for example, transfer of EGF receptors. Adenovirus type 2 is a human adenovirus and the genome of adenovirus 2 is approximately 36 kb in length. Thus, in contrast to human adenovirus type 5 (serotype 2), which has been widely used as a gene transfer vector, adenovirus type 2 (serotype 3) is a human-specific adenovirus and is generally considered to be non-pathogenic (Rose and Derse, 1984). Adenovirus type 2 has thus been considered to have a lower bff6bb2d33
