I need some help modifying the function check_hits_dynamic into check_hits_many (I am not using the arg1). The goal of the latter function is to accept a vector of ints as an argument, and then return a vector that is assigned to a variable. For example, if I did this: for (int i = 0; i < temp_hits; i++) check_hits_many(vx, a, temp_hits); for (int j = 0; j < vx, int arg1, std::vector& hits) { std::vector

. I've been using Notepad++ to manually open the files one by one and format the incorrect characters, and then paste the formatted files into InDesign. It's taking a long time, but I have had the files open in their entirety without the problems I was experiencing before. However, when I opened the files with TextWrangler yesterday, I got the same errors. I did some research and found that this is some kind of compression issue. I had assumed it was the compression that I did on the earlier files, but this workaround didn't work. I still have about a couple hundred files to go, so I don't know if I'll run into this issue again. What can I do to solve this issue? A: Since you are reading text files anyway, I would rather use a tool which is designed to do this, such as Regular Expression Editor. It is a free, open source Java implementation of regular expressions. A: Regular expressions are a very powerful tool; it's easy to overuse them (if you're more used to Perl or Java, this might be easier than learning to use the RegEx tool in Notepad++) and they become unreadable after some time. You have a pretty specific use-case here, and you didn't provide any information on the file format you are encountering. I would recommend using a plain text editor that has the necessary features such as grouping. I would ignore your funny encoding problem and just clean out the problem character combinations. I would not create subfolders, since you are not using them; the.txt extension won't even allow you to create new subfolders anyway. I would not use Notepad++, since it's not intended for that specific job; it's designed to be a text editor first and foremost. I would consider using Notepad2 (the GUI of Notepad++), which has much better support for patterns. After removing the weird characters, you should encounter the problem: if it's simply a single character that doesn't exist in your language and your font, delete it. Alexander S.
