Amazon hopes to turn its set of digital assistants and software into a new generation of tools that will give sellers a way to automate some tasks and help with others, said Brad Smith, vice president of global policies and the chief privacy officer. Amazon has increasingly shifted to pushing digital assistants as a way to make it easier for customers to shop, using microphones in the Amazon Echo speaker and other products to identify what is being said and suggest relevant purchases. "We're starting with a mindset that we want to add value for sellers in their business," Smith told The Wall Street Journal in an interview on Friday. Amazon's interest in leveraging its technology to help sellers is significant because a way for sellers to automate tasks that are mundane but necessary for providing a service could give them a more competitive advantage by helping them focus on other parts of the business that are less automated, said T.C. Peterson, an analyst with Wells Fargo Securities. And because Amazon's technology is so often used by sellers to inform its shoppers of the availability of new products or to help speed up the purchase process, Amazon may be a potential source of clients for sellers who are using its technology. The Seattle-based company will not say how many people it plans to hire for the program, but Smith said that it will be a small group of developers who can work independently. Amazon declined to say whether that team will be focused on artificial intelligence or how it will operate. Smith said that the team will be led by a technical person and has not yet reached a hiring decision. The company plans to unveil the team's initial thoughts in the next few months, and Smith said he expects that the strategy will be to let sellers be "the first ones to use this technology."
