\\[@CIT0024\\]. There are a number of challenges in studying the relationship between oral health and pulmonary health in these younger patients. First, the monitoring of respiratory symptoms is labor intensive, requiring at least 1--2 visits/week for a typical case. Second, patient populations in clinical trials of inhaled therapies are often well-cared for elderly patients who are often more tolerant of short-term handling procedures and hyperosmolar solutions. Third, physicians treating pulmonary diseases are often unwilling or unaware of the importance of oral health, and the other clinical factors that can affect oral health or influence the efficacy of inhaled treatments. Finally, very few patients with COPD have access to dental care, and the effect of dental disease on pulmonary symptoms is not well understood. In summary, we found that, in our cohort of patients with moderate to severe COPD, oral hygiene was suboptimal and that poor oral health was a risk factor for respiratory tract infections. Among the patients with oral diseases, current or recently active respiratory diseases were more common. These data suggest that interventions targeting general oral hygiene as well as management of dental disease may be important in the treatment of COPD. Future research should evaluate whether preventive treatment of oral problems would help patients with COPD to maintain good general health and lower the prevalence and severity of respiratory tract infections.
