The Color Correction Markups are designed to lighten dark areas of images by applying targeted exposure and contrast adjustments. Smaller adjustments to the Color Correction Markups can be applied on individual frames as you edit images, and should be fine-tuned either during playback with the sliders for those marks, or on the timeline and audio tracks with Trim Markups. For an advanced user, or if you need fine-tuning of those marks, you can open your image in Adobe Photoshop. You can also turn on the Color Correction Markups in Trim Tag Turn on integrated previews in the timeline of the footage. As you can see in the following figure, you can perform any edits you like directly on the video sequence. You can smooth out the video exposure by either applying a Color Correction Markup, or with individually applied higher-power adjustments on the Mac. As the image retouches back to the original de-cracked state, all further edits can be performed in Photoshop. Adobe Photoshop has created a range of practical tools to author color correction marks that are compatible with many footage types, including HD video, as well as mini-DV, DV, HDV, and QuickTime. Color Correction Markups apply adjustments in a specific area of an image. They are made up of parameters. For example, a Color Matching Markup is made up of parameters such as local contrast temperature, color balance, and shadow color. When applied to a video sequence, the Color Matching Markups are activated on specific frames and adjust the settings of those frames.
