To establish the short and long term effects of abnormal glucose metabolism in pregnancy on the subsequent health of the mother and future offspring. Using automated capillary assays, we established fasting blood glucose and 2 h blood glucose levels following oral glucose tolerance tests in 160 first-time mothers at 28-42 weeks gestation, using a standard glucose load of 75 g glucose. Fetal growth was assessed by ultrasound scan from each maternal blood sample. The prevalence of macrosomia was higher in mothers with 2 h blood glucose levels greater than 7.8 mmol/L, and there was a greater chance of an abnormal infant at birth with increasing maternal 2 h blood glucose levels following the oral glucose tolerance test. Infant birth weight was strongly associated with maternal diabetes, both pre- and post-partum. Women with persistent abnormal glucose metabolism following pregnancy had significantly more risk of developing diabetes mellitus, both following first pregnancy and their subsequent pregnancies. Abnormal glucose metabolism in pregnancy is associated with more fetal morbidity and morbidity, and increased risk of future diabetes mellitus. Hello, you are currently viewing our boards as a guest.
